On January 13, 2024, the people of Taiwan elected a new president and a new legislature. The Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) candidate, and former vice president, Lai Ching-te, won the presidency. However, the victory for the DPP was limited, as it lost seats in the legislative yuan to the Kuomintang (KMT) and the Taiwan People's Party (TPP). On February 1, 2024, parliament elected Han Kuo-yu, a former KMT presidential candidate, as Speaker.

This election season, rife with Chinese disinformation campaigns and attempts at foreign interference, should be considered a victory for Taiwan and the strength of democracy on the island. Although it is expected that the Lai presidency will offer continuity from the Tsai administration both domestically and internationally, there is significant amount of uncertainty surrounding Taiwan's security and the next steps for China's antagonism.

Indeed, one day after the elections, the Chinese government issued a statement that the elections do not necessarily reflect Taiwanese public opinion. Additionally, China forced the Asian Volleyball Association not to let Taiwan host the 2024 tournament. This reaction inserts itself in a larger pattern of China's attempt to portray Lai as an anti-People's Republic of China (PRC) candidate. However, Lai has repeatedly stated that, despite his own stance on Taiwanese independence, he will continue the Tsai administration's approach of having dialogues with the PRC while asserting Taiwan's right for self-determination. Experts agree that Taiwan should expect a ramp up of the PRC's pressure until May 20th, 2024, the day Lai will be inaugurated as President.

A lesson for democracies the world over on how to preserve an electoral process being interfered with by a hostile actor, the Taiwanese elections should not inspire complacency from the Canadian government and other like-minded nations. Uncertainty in cross-strait relations remains the status quo. However, the election of a vocally independentist President (who has said he would pursue the same foreign policy as his predecessor) and of a Speaker of the legislative yuan from a pro-PRC party provides new factors that will change the dynamics in cross-strait relations. The PRC's efforts to continue to isolate Taiwan from the rest of the international community is to be expected, and there is a need for Taiwan's allies to effectively counter them.

The elections represent an opportunity to re-energize the relationship with Taiwan. Particularly, Canada's chairmanship of the Comprehensive and Progressive Trans-Pacific Partnership (CPTPP) represents a chance to bring Taiwan into the fold of one of the largest free trade agreements in the region.¹ The Taiwan-Canada 2023 Foreign Investment Promotion and Protection Arrangement is another measure through which Canada is able to support Taiwan and make it more resilient to Chinese wolf warrior diplomacy. Those measures serve to bring a certain sense of stability for increased Canada-Taiwan exchanges and make Taiwan a more stable and certain market in which businesses can thrive. This creates a virtuous cycle through which Taiwan continues to be an attractive Asian market for Western countries.

However, it would be misguided to assume that the Taiwanese elections focused on cross-strait relations. Rather, these elections reflect an increasingly complex political landscape and domestic difficulties. Like most countries post-pandemic, Taiwan has been facing economic difficulties, including a job market expansion and then retraction, a housing market that is increasingly unaffordable for most of the population, as well as inflation in part related to supply chain instability. Turnout, despite being in the low 70 per cent, was the second lowest turnout in elections since 1988. Turnout can be explained by a plethora of factors, and only further research (especially of the youth vote) and time will be able to determine if it reflects on the 2024 elections or signal a new trend in Taiwan democratic processes. Furthermore, the elections marked a new era in Taiwanese politics, with a third party entering the balance. In fact, the TPP earned sufficient votes in the legislative yuan to hold significant political power. This will have a significant impact on how the Lai presidency unfolds, as Lai will have to manage an unfriendly legislature.

Those elections carry some lessons for Canada's future foreign policy. It opens the door for a profound reflection of the strategic future of its engagement with Taiwan, and the articulation of an approach that is consistent over time and which offers clarity. Canada ought to have a plan for its current and future relations with Taiwan, one that offers predictability. The latter can be of invaluable help for Taiwan, as it gauges cross-strait relations after Lai takes office in late May 2024.

► Canadian Global Affairs Institute

The Canadian Global Affairs Institute focuses on the entire range of Canada's international relations in all its forms including (in partnership with the University of Calgary's School of Public Policy), trade investment and international capacity building. Successor to the Canadian Defence and Foreign Affairs Institute (CDFAI, which was established in 2001), the Institute works to inform Canadians about the importance of having a respected and influential voice in those parts of the globe where Canada has significant interests due to trade and investment, origins of Canada's population, geographic security (and especially security of North America in conjunction with the United States), social development, or the peace and freedom of allied nations. The Institute aims to demonstrate to Canadians the importance of comprehensive foreign, defence and trade policies which both express our values and represent our interests.

The Institute was created to bridge the gap between what Canadians need to know about Canadian international activities and what they do know. Historically Canadians have tended to look abroad out of a search for markets because Canada depends heavily on foreign trade. In the modern post-Cold War world, however, global security and stability have become the bedrocks of global commerce and the free movement of people, goods and ideas across international boundaries. Canada has striven to open the world since the 1930s and was a driving factor behind the adoption of the main structures which underpin globalization such as the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, the World Trade Organization and emerging free trade networks connecting dozens of international economies. The Canadian Global Affairs Institute recognizes Canada's contribution to a globalized world and aims to inform Canadians about Canada's role in that process and the connection between globalization and security.

In all its activities the Institute is a charitable, non-partisan, non-advocacy organization that provides a platform for a variety of viewpoints. It is supported financially by the contributions of individuals, foundations, and corporations. Conclusions or opinions expressed in Institute publications and programs are those of the author(s) and do not necessarily reflect the views of Institute staff, fellows, directors, advisors or any individuals or organizations that provide financial support to, or collaborate with, the Institute.
