(29.A) Thinking about shared parental leave, some argue that the current system discourages fathers from taking leave, as they tend to earn a higher income than mothers, making mothers the default parent on leave to keep the family’s earnings as high as possible. Others think it should be down to parents to choose how they split leave between them, regardless of the financial implications for families. (29.B) Thinking about shared parental leave, some argue that the current system discourages fathers from taking leave, as they tend to earn a higher income than mothers, making mothers the default parent on leave to keep the family’s earnings as high as possible. Others think it should be down to parents to choose how they split leave between them, regardless of the financial implications for families.
